LIFELINERS UNDER A LENS

What was it like to be filmed doing the intimate work of communicating with the dead across dimensions?

Lifeline group during The uneXplained filming

Lifeline is perhaps the most satisfying, amazing and humbling. The hairs on the back of my neck stand up as I recall the experience!

-B. Kallsen

It was an extraordinary and enlightening experience for me. Since returning from TMI I have made some major life changes.

My perception of the natural world was altered in a way that is not easy to explain...one participant commented that she perceived a much brighter aura around me.

- J. Fisher

The energy and chemistry among diverse total strangers...I was honored to have been a small part of the experience and will always remember it.

When I found out the Lifeline program would be filmed, my first reaction was to avoid it. I didn't want to be filmed. The filming ended up being easier than anticipated. With an already great group of participants and trainers, the film crew added even more and became a presence integral to the energy of the group. The Lifeline program was sometimes touching, sometimes surprising and always interesting, glad that I decided to be part of it.

It's not always easy to share what we experience. Knowing there are people out there who might be afraid to come forward is why I think we all participated. We wanted to say, "You are not alone, there is more going on than you might be led to believe, and you, too, have the ability to experience that for yourself." Don't just take our words for it.

- M. Betts

It was a little odd at first, seeing the crew and The uneXplained film crew cameras hovering around everywhere, but very quickly they felt like part of the family and added to the energy and the experience. I was very humbled and pleased and often moved to tears of gratitude during the meditations and exercises. I am incredibly grateful for having been a part of this amazing Lifeline program and once again having the chance to share in the love and energy of the Monroe Institute.
